The script worked great. you are using a newer version, you might be having problems with CSS display. In previous versions, when the browser determined that a stylesheet was to be used in an inline layout, the CSS rules for the inline format would be inherited from the containing element. It is also possible that IE is skipping styling a table without a border. I've seen this happen with form elements, such as s and s. By default, IE displays a select box with the arrow label and the box around the options. However, this behavior can be disabled. The following CSS sheet should also be moved to a file. It is only a small change, but this will ensure the rules are in the correct place when the page is being served. select {display: block} In an application where you are applying a class to an element, you need to make sure that the display attribute is on the element. For example, the following HTML tags have no display attribute, and may look like they are missing style: In general, if you have a form or an input tag, the associated label element has to have a display of block. For example, you can see that the form has no display, but the label has a display of inline. For web pages, you should limit the amount of
