Release Date:..Q: Check if exe is already running in a Windows service I have a Windows service that I have coded in Delphi XE5 that reads data from a database, creates an *.exe file and then runs it. This runs perfectly fine on the main form of the application but when I run the same application via the service (Windows Start / Control Panel / Services), the exe throws "The process cannot access the file because it is being used by another process" What would be a good and safe way of doing this? A: That looks like a classic case of an attempt to read from a file that is open for writing by another process (the runtime service). You need to establish a bi-directional stream of communication between the two application: The service program must read from the file to get the data, and the main program must send it back. Yes, this is clumsy. I know. A: A service is a different process. A process cannot share a file with another process, period. You'll need to either: Change your file (if you just want to read from it, changing the file is trivial) so that it's no longer being written to. Move the file to another name so that it's not being written to. Both of these will get your code to run. You then have to manage the file from there. Poor housing for our tenants The Redcliffe land is far from safe and it is unacceptable. The housing for our tenants is a disaster. Rental prices have doubled since the late 80s. Our landlords are now producing less space than they could when they were tenanted. The quality of housing is declining as rents climb. The government has a duty of care to the people who live in the country. They have a duty to protect them from war. They have a duty to protect them from the natural world and from criminals. They have a duty to protect them from extreme weather and extreme cold. But they don't 595f342e71
